Consider also that newbie customers can be posting their calls for content on multiple freelance internet sites. Look at the outline for clues that it isn't really a CC exclusive demand. This is tricky, but you get a feeling of CCspecific requests versus more generic requests. If it sounds being a canned request that's very likely put here, there, and everywhere, then CC has a chance to shine! We don't have to sell ourselves just write that article. It's risky because we have been competing with other web pages, but if the topic appeals to your account, you think it can sell to someone else later, then this is an excellent chance to help CC land a new customer. It may take a person like this 5, 10, or 20 requests to find out the value of CC's model over bid sites.

Uncertain about the feasibility as well as logistics, but might be useful information. If you read your descriptions, you'll get a sense of whether your client is serious or certainly not. Look at the Lasik request compared to the SEO request. Both have 0s thus to their purchase rating. I'd write for your Lasik customer without hesitation but I'd be much less inclined to write for your SEO customer just based on how they worded their demands. Also, the date gives a person a clue too. The Lasik request is brand spanking new. Now, if it were about three weeks old and nonetheless showed a zero, I'd figure the consumer's not serious, but since it's a weekend plus the request is just a day or two old, then I'd give him extravagance of the doubt (providing of course that I was considering writing about that unique topic). That said, SEO articles are relatively popular, so if I was so inclined, I'd write one and submit it towards SEO guy. I wouldn't be confident in this guy buying it but I might be confident in some other client buying it determined by the popularity of the subject. So really, if this guy includes made 100 requests without having to bought a single content, my overall decision can be based on the topic's wider appeal.
