Undecided about the feasibility or maybe logistics, but might be practical information. If you read your descriptions, you'll get a sense of whether the client is serious or not necessarily. Look at the Lasik request compared to the SEO request. Both have 0s for his or her purchase rating. I'd write for your Lasik customer without doubt but I'd be less inclined to write for your SEO customer just based along the way they worded their demands. Also, the date gives an individual a clue too. The Lasik request is brand spanking new. Now, if it were some weeks old and still showed a zero, I'd figure the buyer's not serious, but since it's a weekend as well as the request is just on a daily basis or two old, then I'd give him extravagance of the doubt (providing not surprisingly that I was keen on writing about that special topic). That said, SEO articles are reasonably popular, so if I have been so inclined, I'd write one and submit it towards the SEO guy. I wouldn't be confident with this guy buying it but I might be confident in other client buying it based on the popularity of the subject. So really, if this guy possesses made 100 requests without bought a single content, my overall decision could be based on the topic's more expansive appeal.

Take into account also that newbie customers can be posting their calls to get content on multiple freelance web sites. Look at the explanation for clues that it's not a CC exclusive ask. This is tricky, but you get a feeling of CCspecific requests opposed to more generic requests. If it sounds being a canned request that's likely put here, there, and everywhere, then CC has an opportunity to shine! We don't have selling ourselves just write this article. It's risky because we live competing with other web pages, but if the topic appeals back, you think it can sell to another later, then this is a great chance to help CC land the latest customer. It may take an individual like this 5, 10, or 20 requests to see the value of CC's model over bid sites.
